Past perfect simple vs. past perfect continuous We use the past perfect to talk about activities that ended (the simple form) or were in progress (the continuous form) before a point in time in the past. These tenses are used in the following way. 1. For activities that can continue for a long time (work, run, study, travel, sleep) we can use both the past perfect simple and continuous. There is practically no difference in meaning, but the continuous is more usual in English. Stephen was pretty tired. He had worked all day. Stephen was pretty tired. He had been working all day. 2. In other cases these two forms have a completely different meaning. The past perfect simple refers to actions that were completed while the past perfect continuous describes activities that were not completed before a point in time in the past. Past perfect simple: Before midnight Paul had translated the article. (He finished his work.) Past perfect continuous: Before midnight Paul had been translating the article. (He did not finish it. He was still translating at that moment.) 3. If we refer to a number of individual events or events that were repeated, we must use the simple form. Before the lesson ended they had written three tests. (We talk about three individual completed activities.) 4. If we describe one uninterrupted continuous activity we use the continuous form. It was exhausting. They had been writing tests since the lessons started. (We talk about one uninterrupted incomplete activity.) I / you / he / she / it / we / they had gone. I / you / he / she / it / we / they hadn't gone. Had I / you / he / she / it / we / they gone? I / you / he / she / it / we / they had been going. I / you / he / she / it / we / they hadn't been going. Had I / you / he / she / it / we / they been going? Complete the sentences below by putting the verb in brackets into the past perfect simple or past perfect continuous: I didn't been to London. I hadn't been to London. We use the helping verb had (negative = hadn't) in the past perfect. When I saw him, I noticed that he had a haircut. When I saw him I noticed that he had had a haircut. The action (a haircut) happened before the other past action (I noticed). We use the past perfect for the action which happened first to make the time order clear to the listener. He told me has been to London. He told me he had been to London. His original words were: "I have been to London." However, in reported speech we move the tense back - the present perfect (have been) becomes past perfect (had been). I had working hard, so I felt very tired.I had been worked hard, so I felt very tired. I had been working hard, so I felt very tired. The form of the past perfect continuous is had + been + verb (-ing). I had been hearing the song many times before. I had heard the song many times before. Some verbs (called stative verbs) are not normally used in the continuous form, e.g. know, like, understand, believe, hear, etc. Test 1. Past perfect simple or continuous?
