Because of the rigorous nature of these classes, students must carefully consider which AP classes to take, evaluating which options will present a reasonable academic challenge. In 2020, about 334,000 students took the AP English literature and composition exam. Although AP English literature is popular, this course may not be appropriate or advantageous for all students. Students in AP English literature and composition analyze works of fiction, drama, and poetry from various time periods and literary movements. During their analysis, they may consider political and historical contexts. Students must read works critically and reflect on their reading through expository, persuasive, and argumentative essays. Creatively, students must identify key elements of authors' speaking and writing styles. This requires students to have strong analytical and creative abilities. AP English literature and composition also involves analyzing and evaluating texts. Students must understand how authors use language to convey ideas and emotions. They must be able to identify and explain the function of character, setting, and plot. AP English literature and composition is a challenging class for many learners. Students can consider nationwide score distributions and district averages, as well as their own English literature capabilities, to gauge whether they are likely to succeed in this course. Although the difficulty of the AP English literature exam is largely dependent on an individual's abilities and the quality of instruction at their school, students may experience performance as a metric to assess the test's difficulty. Compared to all AP exams, the AP English literature exam has a lower pass rate than average. This suggests that it may be one of the harder AP tests. Only 9.3% of AP English literature test-takers received a perfect score of 5 in 2020, whereas 19.6% of all AP test-takers earned a 5 on their exams. By this measure, AP English literature and composition is more difficult than the average AP course. Although AP STEM and history courses may require more memorization, AP English literature and composition is a very fast-paced English class. Students will likely have a large amount of reading to keep up with the curriculum and comprehend arctic and dense texts. Students also have to learn and demonstrate a working knowledge of literary concepts through frequent writing assignments.
