Check, curb, repress, restrain refer to putting a control on movement, progress, action, etc. Check implies the use of a means such as a chain, strap, frame, wall, etc., to guide or control or to force to stay within definite limits: to curb a horse. Repress, formerly meaning to suppress, now implies preventing the action or development that might naturally be expected: to repress evidence of excitement. Restrain implies the use of force to put under control, or chiefly, to hold back: to restrain a person from violent acts. Examples have not been reviewed. There is also a plan to allow people to show is cheque. A check is a bill of exchange or document that guarantees a certain amount of money. It is printed for the drawing bank to provide to an account holder (the payor) to use. The payor writes the check and gives it to the payee, who then takes it to their bank for cash or to deposit into an account. Checks essentially provide a way to instruct the bank to transfer funds from the payers account. The use of checks allows two or more parties to make a monetary transaction without using physical currency of the same amount. Checks are generally written against a checking account, but they can also be used to move funds from savings accounts. Checks can be used to make bill payments, as gifts, or to transfer sums between two people or entities. They are generally seen as a more secure way of transferring money than cash, especially with large sums. If a check is lost or stolen, a third party is not able to cash it, as the payee is the only one who can negotiate the check. Modern financial tools that work similarly to checks in that they provide a substitute for physical currency include: debit and credit cards, money orders, wire transfers, and internet banking. Checks have been in existence in one form or another since ancient times. Many people believe a type of check was used among the ancient Romans. Modern checks, as we know them today, became popular in the 20th century. Check usage surged in the 1950s as the check process became automated and machines were able to sort and clear checks. Check cards, first created in the 1960s, were the precursors to todays debit cards. Credit and debit cardsand other forms of electronic paymenthave since overshadowed checks as the dominant means of paying for most goods and services. Checks are now somewhat uncommon but still occasionally used. While not all checks look alike, they generally share the same key features. The name and contact information of the person writing the check is located at the top left. The name of the bank that holds the drawers account appears on the check. This is indicated by the phrase "Pay to the Order Of."The amount of the check in a dollar figure is filled out in the box next to the payees name. has an endorsement line for the payees signature when they are cashing or depositing the check. The receiving bank often stamps the back with a deposit stamp at the time it is deposited or cashed, after which it goes for clearing. Once the drawing bank receives the check, it is stamped again and filed. In some cases the check is sent back to the payor. The oldest surviving American checkbook, from the Bank of New York, dates to the 1790s. In addition to the standard personal check, types of checks include certified check verifies that the drawers account has enough funds to honor the amount of the check. In other words, the check is guaranteed by the bank will ascertain its authenticity with the payor. A cashiers check is guaranteed by the bank is responsible for paying the funds. This type of check is often required for large transactions, such as buying a car or house. Another type is a payroll check, or paycheck, which an employee for their work. In recent years, physical paychecks have given way to direct deposit systems and other forms of electronic transfer. When someone writes a check for an amount larger than what is held in their checking account, the check cannot be processed, as there are insufficient or non-sufficient funds (NSF) in the account (the two terms are interchangeable). A bounced check usually results in a penalty fee for the payor. In some cases, the payer is also charged a fee. Other check jou write), a check printing fee, and a returned deposit item fee is charged when you deposit a check in your account that bounces. Banks have different policies on bounced checks. Oftentimes, banks charge overdraft fees or non-sufficient funds fees on bounced checks. Some banks may provide a grace period, such as 24 hours, in which time you can deposit funds to avoid the overdraft fees or non-sufficient funds fees on bounced checks. bank may place a hold on some of those funds if the check exceeds $5,252. It can also place a hold on the entire amount if it has reason to believe the check will not clear. Both certified checks are considered more secure than personal checks. Cashier's checks are signed by banks and drawn against a bank's account, while certified checks are signed by an individual and drawn against a personal account. Both checks are guaranteed by the bank, which makes them more secure. Checks are designed for different purposes and for different

[Middle English chek, check in chess, from Old French eschec, from Arabic h, from Persian, king, check; see shah.] Word History: The words check, chess, and shah are all related. Shah, as one might think, is a borrowing into English of the Persian title for the monarch of that country. The Persian word in this sense, after passing through Arabic, probably Old Spanish, and then Old French, came into Middle English as chek about seven hundred years ago. Chess itself comes from a plural form of the Old French word that gave us the word check. Checkmate, the next stage after check, goes back to the Arabic phrase shh mt, meaning "the king is dead." Through a complex development having to do with senses that evolved from the notion of checking the
